The idea I have chosen for the basis of my website is to create a personal website that outlines some of the work I have done in the course, information about myself and other projects/media that I am currently working on. The website itself will be quite minimalist, with a majority of the content being positioned in the middle of the page. The proximity of the items will help visitors to the website navigate it with ease; and by choosing a monochromatic colour pallet, using mainly black and white, it will be easy for the viewers to view the content. I have structured the website to flow from page to page, with the navigation bar set in the middle of the page above any content below. Each page will have its own unique content, paired with pictures and videos that I will provide. The website will have text/content boxes that are spaced out to match the website's clean minimalist aesthetic. By having the title of each page within the same repeated text box, as well as a large font, it will stand out from the remainder of the website. I'd like the website to have a sense of 'flow' to it, where the content and media can all be accessed without any digging around. I'd like each page to be longer, so the user can scroll down the website rather than scan it left-right. Putting all the content in a centred alignment will also make the website look sleek and sophisticated, as there won't be any content thrown to the sides to distract the viewer from looking at the content.

The website will be broken down into three pages: The home page, the "about me" page, and the "portfolio" page. The home page will contain need-to-know content all within a main centred text box and a footer that contains my social media information. The homepage will allow visitors to the website to read a quick summary as to who I am, what the website is about, etc. The "about me" page will give information as to what my interests are, what I am studying, media about me, etc. This information will be stored in the text box, with accompanying photos on the right for readers to view whilst reading. Moving down the page will generate more content for the viewer, such as links to my SoundCloud and youtube channels, videos, and some more text. Finally, the "portfolio" page will contain screenshots and images of the work that I have produced in this class, as well as other classes. This page will also have basic information about some of my achievements, work, and creative mindset.

By having a website that looks sleek, clean, and professional, it will attract more viewers to read the information I put on it. And if I would want to use this website as a resume, or continually update it, then the simplistic layout will allow me to do so.
